Oil painting - Maestro Giorgio of Gubbio: design for a mosaic in the Museum (the 'Kensington Valhalla')

Object: Oil painting

Place of origin: England (painted)

Date: ca. 1870 (painted)

Artist/Maker: Hart, Solomon Alexander, born 1806 - died 1881 (artist)

Materials and Techniques: oil on canvas

Credit Line: Commissioned for the decoration of the South Kensington Museum

Museum number: 46-1874

Gallery location: In Storage

Public access description

This is a portrait of Giorgio di Pietro Andreoli. Known as Maestro Giorgio, he worked between 1492 and 1536 as a potter in Gubbio. This town was one of the two main centres for the production of lustre pottery in Italy in the 16th century. Giorgio’s modelling tools are shown in a pouch fixed to his belt. He is holding up the two-handled vase acquired for the V&A by J.C. Robinson in 1865, as was the bowl on the table in the painting.

When Solomon Hart composed the portrait the Museum did not know that the vase was by Giorgio himself. Hart included it either as an example of a technique associated with Giorgio’s name or as a work by the potter’s master, to whom Giorgio was shown paying tribute. More recently, new evidence has suggested that Giorgio was the potter.

The portrait is part of the ‘Kensington Valhalla’. This is a series of life-size portraits of those artists who, in the 1860s, were seen as the major figures in the history of European art. The portraits were copied in mosaic to decorate the South Court of the Museum.

Descriptive line

Oil painting on canvas, 'Maestro Giorgio of Gubbio', Solomon Alexander Hart, England, ca. 1870

Physical description

Oil painting on canvas in colour with gold background; life size portrait of the Maestro Giorgio of Gubbio holding a vase in an arched, wooden frame.

Dimensions

Height: 264.2 cm estimate, Width: 87.6 cm estimate, Height: 2790 mm wood frame (max), Width: 1000 mm wood frame, Depth: 55 mm wood frame

Museum number

46-1874

Object history note

Commissioned for the decoration of the South Court of the South Kensington Museum

Historical significance: Giorgio di Pietro Andreoli, known as Maestro Giorgio, worked between 1492 and 1536 as a potter of maiolica at Gubbio, after which he ceded the leadership of the family workshop to his son Vincenzo, and may have retired. He died in 1553 or soon afterwards. His workshop is most admired for its use of ruby and golden lustre. Very little is known of his life, and nothing of his physical appearance, so we must assume that Hart has invented this portrait. His modelling tools are shown in a pouch fixed to his belt, and he holds up a two-handled vase with lid, identical to one of about 1510 acquired by the museum in 1865. On the painting table is a bowl identical to one also of about 1510 and acquired by the museum in 1865. Both the vase and the bowl have the characteristic lustre glaze.

When this portrait was composed, the vase was not attributed to Giorgio himself and was used either as an example of a technique associated with his name or as a work by his master, to whom Giorgio was shown paying tribute. More recently, new evidence has led to an attribution to Giorgio himself.

An English painter specialising in portraits, church interiors and large historical canvases, Solomon Alexander Hart (1806-1881) was Professor of Painting at the Royal Academy from 1854 to 1863, and Librarian 1864 to 1881. He was also Art Examiner at the South Kensington Schools.

Historical context note

Commissioned between 1862 and 1871, the ‘Kensington Valhalla’ (so named by The Builder, an allusion to the eternal home of heroes in Norse mythology) is a series of life-size portraits of famous artists. These portraits, executed in mosaic, were made to fit into the arcade niches that ran round the upper level of the South Court of the Museum. The Valhalla included not only painters and sculptors, such as Leonardo,
Michelangelo and Donatello, but also figures from the applied arts such as the potter Bernard Palissy. The project had a self-validatory function: it reflected the established canon of great artists, predominantly those of the Italian Renaissance, whose work the museum was collecting where possible. But by including craftsmen within the pantheon, Henry Cole and the South Kensington Museum modified and expanded this canon, asserting their belief in the connection between the fine and applied arts - a tenet which lay at the heart of the institution.

A number of established contemporary artists were approached to produce highly-finished oil-painted portraits on which the mosaics could be based. As early as January 1862, Daniel Maclise was offered a payment of £70, although his name does not figure among the artists whose work was eventually translated into mosaic. Also invited but not ultimately to participate were William Holman Hunt, Ford Madox Brown and, perhaps most surprisingly, James McNeill Whistler. Of the participants, Frederic Leighton, E.J. Poynter and G.F. Watts were the highest profile painters commissioned for the project, with Val Prinsep, F. R. Pickersgill, Charles West Cope, Eyre Crowe and William Frederick Yeames, all historical genre painters, in the next rank.

In addition to these external commissions, a high proportion - almost a third - of the artists involved in the project were employed by the Museum or the School of Art. Godfrey Sykes, who designed two portraits (although only one was used), had been recruited by Henry Cole in 1859 to assist with decorative schemes, and became a key figure in the decoration of the Museum buildings; he devised the elaborate scheme of decoration in the South Court. Sykes's principal assistants, Reuben Townroe and James Gamble, both designed Valhalla portraits (although only Townroe's was used). Francis Moody, who designed three portraits, was employed at the Museum as another of Sykes's assistants, helping to carry out the decoration of the Museum and heading a team of student workers. Richard Burchett, who designed four portraits, was the Headmaster of the Art School at South Kensington, and Eyre Crowe, who designed two, had acted since 1859 as occasional examiner and inspector there. Richard Redgrave, responsible for one portrait, was the first Keeper of the paintings collection at the Museum, and helped to carry out the decoration of the South School including Headmaster. Henry Bowler, also responsible for one portrait, was the Museum's Inspector for Art then later Assistant Director for Art. William Bell Scott, who had taught at the Department of Science and Art-run Newcastle School of Art for twenty years, acted as an examiner in the 1860s.

The Valhalla itself includes many famous artists, but there are also one or two of some obscurity, Phidias and Apelles were the pre-eminent sculptor and painter of Greek Antiquity. The rest are European artists of the Middle Ages and later, mostly painters. The sculptors include Nicola Pisano, Ghiberti, Donatello, Luca della Robbia, who specialised in glazed and coloured terracotta sculpture, Michelangelo and the English Grinling Gibbons. Jean Goujon was a 16th-century French sculptor who worked on the earliest part of the Louvre. There are only three architects, and all, oddly, are English: William of Wykeham (who was in fact a patron of architects rather than a practitioner), Inigo Jones and Sir Christopher Wren.

There are also three ceramic artists. Fra Beato Giacomo da Ulma seems almost unknown in art history outside this Valhalla, but is said to have been a Dominican Friar of the late 15th and early 16th centuries who painted on glass at Bologna. Better documented are the maiolica painter Maestro Giorgio of Gubbio and Bernard Palissy, the French potter of the 16th century, known for his enamelled earthenware encrusted with modelled reptiles. Three metalworkers might equally well be regarded as sculptors: William Torrel, who made the bronze effigies of Henry II and Queen Eleanor in Westminster Abbey in the 1290s; Torrigiano, the Italian Renaissance sculptor who made the monument to Henry VII and his Queen in the Henry VII Chapel in Westminster Abbey; and Peter Vischer of Nuremberg, who made the bronze monument to St Sebald, in the church of St Sebald in Nuremberg.

Netherlandish art is represented solely by Lancelot Blondeel, sculptor and painter of Bruges; a design for a portrait of Jan van Eyck by Francis Moody seems never to have been executed. There are ten Italian painters of the Renaissance; one German, Hans Holbein; and one Spanish, Velasquez. The two English painters are Hogarth and Reynolds.

Where possible, artists were matched with sitters appropriate to their own work. So Leighton was commissioned to paint Cimabue, the subject of his first major work, Cimabue's Madonna carried through Florence which had brought his work to prominence for the first time when it was shown at the Royal Academy in 1855; Edward Armitage, a vigorous promoter of mural painting, was commissioned to paint the greatest muralist of the Italian Renaissance, Benozzo Gozzoli; and Poynter, who had made his name with compositions of classical subjects, was matched with the Ancient Greeks Apelles and Phidias.

Because of the uniformity demanded by a large portrait series, the artists' poses and gestures are mostly invented. The faces, hair and headgear are mostly derived, or adapted, from printed sources, in particular the woodcuts which illustrate Vasari's Lives of the Artists, or in the case of later artists, engravings after portraits or self-portraits. The costume details of the Italian Renaissance artists are taken from one of the published compilations of historical costume which were popular with historical genre painters, whilst the costumes of later artists is usually taken from printed portraits.

The mosaics themselves remained in place in the South Court until 1949, when they were taken down and stored. Some are now on display in other galleries of the museum. Currently the paintings made as full-scale designs for these mosaics are displayed in various locations in the Museum, including the Lecture Theatre, the staircase to the west of the Grand Entrance and the landing outside the entrance to the National Art Library.

URL

http://collections.vam.ac.uk/item/O85528/maestro-giorgio-of-gubbio-design-oil-painting-hart-solomon-alexander/